The Daily Quote

"The idea of allowing the country to default by refusing to increase the debt limit is getting more widespread and serious traction among House Republicans than people realize, though GOP leaders think shutting down the government is the much more likely outcome of the spending fights this winter. 'I think it is possible that we would shut down the government to make sure President Obama understands that we're serious,' House Republican Conference Chairwoman Cathy McMorris Rodgers of Washington state told us. 'We always talk about whether or not we're going to kick the can down the road. I think the mood is that we've come to the end of the road'... GOP officials said more than half of their members are prepared to allow default unless Obama agrees to dramatic cuts he has repeatedly said he opposes. Many more members, including some party leaders, are prepared to shut down the government to make their point. House Speaker John Boehner 'may need a shutdown just to get it out of their system,' said a top GOP leadership adviser. 'We might need to do that for member-management purposes — so they have an endgame and can show their constituents they're fighting.'"
